

Journey to the Academy Awards: A Decade of Race & Gender in Oscar-Shortlisted Documentaries (2008-2017)

PRELIMINARY KEY FINDINGS

February 2017

In the Best Documentary Feature category of the Academy Awards, 2017 is a year of firsts. For the first time, four of the five Oscar-nominated documentary directors in the category are people of color (Roger Ross Williams, for Life, Animated; Ezra Edelman, for O.J.: Made in America; Ava DuVernay, for 13th; and Raoul Peck, for I Am Not Your Negro). In fact, 2017 reveals the largest percentage of Oscar-shortlisted documentary directors of color over at least the past decade. Almost a third (29%) of this year's 17 credited Oscar-shortlisted documentary directors (in the Best Documentary Feature category) are people of color, up from 18 percent in 2016, none in 2015, and 17 percent in 2014. The percentage of recognized women documentary directors, while an increase from last year (24 percent of recognized shortlisted directors in 2017 are women, compared to 18 percent in 2016), remains at relatively the same low level of recognition over the past decade.

In 2016, as a response to widespread criticism and negative media coverage, the Academy of Motion Picture Arts & Sciences welcomed a record number of new members to become part of the voting class to bestow Academy Awards: 683 film professionals (46 percent women, 41 percent people of color) were invited in.<sup>2</sup> According to the Academy, prior to this new 2016 class, its membership was 92 percent white and 75 percent male.<sup>3</sup> To represent the documentary category, 42 new documentary creative professionals (directors and producers) were invited as new members.

Over the past several years, criticism about "Oscars so white" reached beyond the ranks of Hollywood's inner business circles into consumer consciousness.<sup>4</sup> However, the media and public backlash largely focused on the entertainment business' big scripted films, actors and actresses. The documentary feature category is largely excluded from the cultural conversation about diversity and inclusion in entertainment storytelling, despite the documentary genre's vital place in the marketplace and a functioning democracy.

And yet, despite notable achievements and improvement in recognizing directors of color and female directors, the documentary field may have similar challenges of diversity and inclusion. This study spotlights at least one important numerical reality of the challenge – at one notable level of international achievement in film.

OVERVIEW

For a documentary filmmaker, being recognized by the Academy of Motion Picture Arts & Sciences for an Oscar nomination in the Best Documentary Feature category is often the pinnacle moment in a career. Beyond the celebratory achievement, the acknowledgment can open up doors for funding and opportunities for next films and career opportunities. Formal Academy recognition in documentary feature films happens in three phases: It begins in December with the Academy’s announcement of a shortlist—15 films that advance to a formal nomination for the Academy’s Best Documentary Feature Award. Then, in mid-January, the final list of five official nominations is announced. Finally, at the end of February or early March, the one winner is announced at the Academy Awards ceremony.

What does it take for a documentary film and its director and producer to make it to the top—the Oscars shortlist, the nomination and the win? Which film directors and producers are recognized—in terms of race and gender? Are the shortlisted films’ stories focused on pressing social issues, or slice-of-life entertainment stories? Where can audiences see the documentaries—on PBS, HBO, iTunes, Netflix and beyond?

This study is the first to examine a full decade of Academy Award-shortlisted, -nominated and -winning documentary films—a total of 150 films, 190 credited directors, and 1,027 producers (credited executive producers, producers, and co-producers); in total, this study examines all films as well as the race and gender identifications of 1,217 credited creative professionals (directors and producers). From this close investigation of Oscar-shortlisted documentary films, consistent patterns emerge to paint a portrait of documentary representation at this highest level of achievement.

KEY FINDINGS

SPOTLIGHT: 2017 Oscar-Shortlisted and -Nominated Documentary Films

Race: Directors & Producers:

Of the 17 shortlisted documentary directors (across 15 films), 71 percent are white, and 29 percent are directors of color (a notable increase from 18 percent directors of color in 2016). Of the 126 Oscar-shortlisted documentary producers (executive producers, producers, and co-producers across 15 films), 92 percent are white, and 8 percent are producers of color. For the first time in 2017, four out of the five formally Oscar-nominated documentary directors are directors of color.

Gender: Directors & Producers:

Of the 17 shortlisted documentary directors (across 15 films), 76 percent are male, and 24 percent are women (up from 18 percent in 2016). Of the 126 Oscar-shortlisted documentary producers (executive producers, producers, and co-producers across 15 films), 51 percent are men, and 49 percent are women.

RACE (2008-2017): Over a decade, Oscar shortlist recognition consistently favors white documentary directors and producers, despite notable changes in 2017.

Documentary directors and producers recognized by the Academy Awards shortlist and nomination process are overwhelmingly white. Across ten years of data (2008-2017), only 25 directors of color have been represented in the Oscars shortlist for documentaries – 13 percent of all directors. (Notably, of the 25 shortlist-recognized documentary directors of color, five were recognized in 2017.) Almost 9 in 10 (87%) of shortlist-recognized documentary directors over the past decade are white.

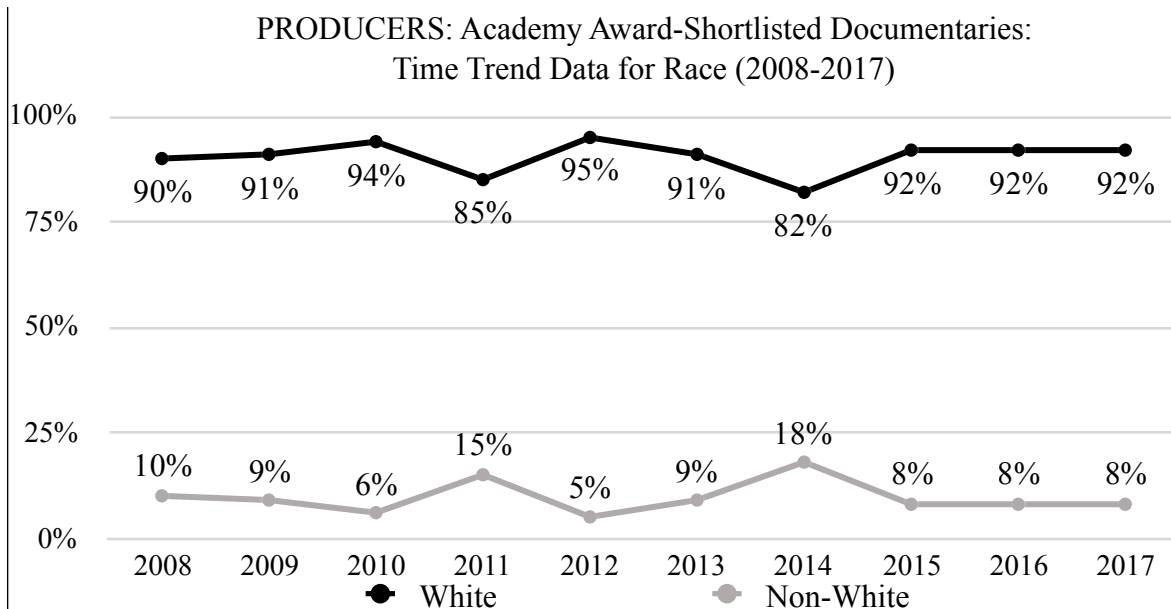

The portrait is much the same for recognized documentary producers. Over a full decade (1,028 total producers), 9 percent of documentary producers in the Oscars shortlist are people of color; more than 9 in 10 (91%) are white.

People of Color in Academy Award-Shortlisted Documentaries:
As Producers & Directors (2008-2017)

DIRECTORS: Academy Award-Shortlisted Documentaries:
Time Trend Data for Race (2008 to 2017)

GENDER (2008-2017): Recognition of female documentary directors remains consistently rare. However, women – under male directors – are significantly more likely to be formally recognized as producers than as directors.

Documentaries that are recognized with Academy Award shortlist and nomination recognitions are primarily directed by men. Despite notable outlier years and individual successes, this trend has not changed over the past decade. Over the past ten years, 25 percent of Oscar-shortlisted documentary directors are women; three-quarters of the recognized directors are men (75%).

However, an interesting pattern and significant difference emerges for female producers: Over the past decade, 42 percent of Oscar-shortlisted documentary producers are women, while 58 percent are men. Women are significantly more likely to be recognized as producers than directors.

* Statistically significant at  $p < .01$ . Women are significantly less likely to be credited as directors vs. producers. Stated another way, women are significantly more likely to be credited as producers than they are as directors.

TOPICS (2008-2017): Pressing social issues are likely to be shortlisted for Oscar recognition.

Consistently, documentaries that work at the intersection of investigative journalism and film — spotlighting contemporary social issues and perhaps impacting them — are recognized by the Academy in the shortlist process. Across ten years, about 7 in 10 (69%) of the Oscar-shortlisted films are “social issue” stories (such as the 2015 Oscar-winning documentary film CitizenFour) compared with 31 percent that are focused on entertainment stories (for example, the 2014 Oscar-winning documentary 20 Feet from Stardom).

DISTRIBUTION (2008-2017): Film festivals and online streaming platforms dominate Oscar-shortlisted and nominated films' distribution plans.

All of the documentary films shortlisted over the past three years employed a multi-tiered distribution strategy, including the film festival circuit, TV broadcast and streaming; a theatrical screening is required for an Academy Award shortlist and nomination, so all of the films completed some limited or extensive theatrical runs. Only a few films didn't complete all three distributions levels (festivals, streaming, TV) in their road to Oscar, given the importance of audience (and Academy) awareness and buzz around the films.<sup>5</sup>

Film festivals play a vital role. Across ten years of data, 100 percent of Oscar-shortlisted films screen at film festivals; almost half (47%) show at the Sundance Film Festival. Strategic layered distribution beyond the theater is key for these documentary films; about 9 in 10 (88%) are available via online streaming at some point in their marketplace lifecycles, on iTunes, Netflix, and Amazon as top destinations.

TV is part of the layered documentary distribution model. Seven in 10 (71%) of the past decade's Oscar-shortlisted documentaries also had TV broadcast windows. Public broadcasting remains a vital home for high-quality documentaries; 29 percent of Oscar-shortlisted documentaries have aired on PBS (compared to 19 percent on HBO, 3 percent on National Geographic and CNN, and 21 percent across a range of cable TV outlets).<sup>6</sup>

AWARDS: Oscar-Shortlisted Documentary Feature Films are Recognized by Cinema Eye Honors, Sundance Film Festival and Emmy Awards.

The one award that is consistently the best connection to an Oscar shortlist recognition for documentary films is the relatively new Cinema Eye Honors, followed by awards given at the Sundance Film Festival, and the Emmys. About 27 percent of the shortlisted documentaries won Cinema Eye Honors, 22 percent won Sundance Film Festival awards, and 15 percent won Emmy Awards.

Despite their prominence in the entertainment business, the major industry awards—Directors Guild of America (DGA), Writers Guild of America (WGA), Producers Guild of America (PGA)—generally don't register as prominently for the majority of Oscar-shortlisted and nominated films. (The notable exception is the 2015 Oscar winner in the Best Documentary Feature category, CitizenFour, which won almost all of these awards, plus additional journalism awards.) Most of the shortlisted and nominated documentary filmmakers win many awards in the national and international film festival circuit, much more so than the ones sponsored by the entertainment guilds (i.e., DGA, WGA, PGA).

<sup>5</sup> Although alternative distribution was not a systematic element included in this particular study, it's worth mentioning the fact that many documentary films also pursue community/grassroots and educational screenings. Additionally, the shortlisted films screen at industry events, including screenings for the Academy of Motion Picture Arts & Sciences, the entertainment industry guilds, the International Documentary Association screening series and others.

<sup>6</sup> Note: To look at time-trend data or final totals, it's too early to make final determinations about changes over time between the major distribution mechanisms, given that many of the 2017 shortlisted and nominated films are still in the early or mid-level phases of their films' life cycles, which means TV and streaming windows may still be to come. We plan to review the data and distribute final findings later in 2017 after the most recent films have maximized their final distribution opportunities.

METHODOLOGY

This key findings document represents the preliminary findings of a formal study to be released later in 2017. Directed by Cathy Borum Chattoo, director of the Center for Media & Social Impact, a team of four researchers systematically gathered, archived and fact-checked data for 150 total films across three years (2008-2017) along the road to the Academy Award. Data gathering took place from October 2016 to February 2017. The examined films were all shortlisted for the Academy Award in November of the preceding year (15 each per year), with five progressing each year – the following January or February after the shortlist announcement – to the formal Oscar nomination for Best Documentary Feature Film. Each film was then categorized and coded according to key areas of interest in which data could be comprehensively and accurately gathered and confirmed via publicly-available information: Credited directors’ general racial (white or non-white) and gender (male or female) categories; film topic areas (social-issues dominated or slice-of-life entertainment narratives); distribution details across festivals, TV and streaming platforms; and awards. With regard to distribution mechanisms – streaming, festivals, TV – a cautionary note is in order for 2017 films and the ability to make full averaged conclusions across the three studied years about year-to-year trends and totals yet, as many 2017 films (i.e., shortlisted in 2016 for consideration in the 2017 Academy Awards) may pursue TV and streaming distribution sometime later this year, given where they are in the full life cycles of the films.

Across a full decade of shortlisted documentary films (150 total films), a total of 190 filmmakers were formally credited as directors, given that some films credited more than one director; all directors were coded for this analysis, including any instances in which a director was credited as a “co-director.” A total of 1,028 formally credited producers were also categorized by race and gender, including decision-making producer roles: executive producer, producer, and co-producer. “Associate producer” was not included given inconsistent crediting and lack of decision-making power in this role. If a director was credited additionally as a producer, that person was counted in both the director category and the producer category in order to maintain an accurate and complete portrait within the two distinct groups. Combined, 1,217 credited directors and producers were examined. Intercoder reliability was tested among two coders who independently coded 20 percent of the full sample of 150 films; across all coding categories, intercoder reliability achieved an average of 96 percent agreement. Based on a satisfactory result, three researchers coded all remaining data, which was checked by the project’s principal investigator.

Data was collected and checked using a cross-referenced combination of the official film websites, IMDB profiles, and media coverage about each film and filmmaker during the period from shortlist to nomination to Academy Awards. Best efforts were made to verify each available data point through multiple sources of public information and additional documentary industry fact-checking with International Documentary Association personnel. With regard to race: For this analysis, only “white” and “non-white” were coded, given the limitations of using visual and media data (photos, IMDB profiles, media articles) alone. More granular and precise racial identifications of film directors and producers – beyond broad categories of white and non-white – were not determined given the potential challenges in visual identifications (cross-referenced with media articles as needed).

About the Center for Media & Social Impact

The Center for Media & Social Impact (CMSI) at American University’s School of Communication, based in Washington, D.C., is a research center and innovation lab that creates, studies, and showcases media for social impact. Focusing on independent, documentary, entertainment and public media, CMSI bridges boundaries between scholars, producers and communication practitioners who work across media production, media impact, public policy, and audience engagement. The Center produces resources for the field and research; convenes conferences and events; and works collaboratively to understand and design media that matter.
